The sun had scarcely risen from its watery bed, far away amid the blue waves of the sea of Japan, tinting the horizon and the sea with its golden beams, when a shout from the mast-head was heard, "There she blows! There she blows?"

"Where away?" cried the captain.

"Three points off the lee-bow, sir," replied the man slott.

"Where away?" cried the captain.

"Three points off the lee-bow, sir," replied the man aloit.

"What does it look like?" inquired the captain.

"Right whale, sir—fin out—lies like a log," was the reply.

Our good skipper, who was a man of about forty, with a rough and hardy-looking visage, orders the man at the helm to "keep her off a point;" meanwhile he suspends the spyglass about his neck, and ascends the rigging for the purpose of getting a better view of the prize.

Now, our ship was a snug craft, of about five hundred tons burthen, and contained a crew that were unequaled in point of intelligence, energy and good nature. Led on as they were by bold and daring officers, but a few of those monsters of the deep escaped the deadly lance if they came within killing distance. While the movements of the whales were watched from aloft, all hands were called and preparations made for the chase. The boats were swung off the cranes; the harpoor, and lances, spades, hatchets, knife and bucket, water-keg, thole-pins, and other paraphernalia for catching and killing whales, were placed in the boats. The ship was kept off, bearing down with a gentle breeze towards an old cow-whale and her calf, which lay busking in the warm rays of the burning sun. When within a half mile of them, the order away. The crew step nimbly about, all bustle and control than the main yard aback and lower away. The crew step nimbly about, all bustle and control than the main yard aback and lower away. The boatsteerers or harpoonmen are all ready in their respective boats, together with their mates, and as they strike the water and the tackles are cast off, the crew of each scramble down the chains of the ship and place themselves at their regular posts, as each man has a set duty to perform; the nature of that duty is determined by the place he occupies in the boat. Six men form a boat's crew, viz.: a mate, boatsteerer and four secondary of the ship and place themselves. Few are the creaturessoutterly evil as to abuse a generous confidence; a calm forbearance. Married persons should be preminently friends, and fidelity is the great privilege of friendship. The forbearance here contended for is not weak and wicked indulgence of each other's faults, but such a calm, tender observance of them as excludes all harshness and anger, and takes the best and gentlest methods of pointing them out it the full confidence of affections. a boat's crew, viz.: a mate, boatsteerer and four regular oarsmen; the boatsteerer usually pulls an oar until the boat approaches near the whale they wish to attack, when he "peaks" his oar, and standing up in the bow of the boat, grasps the harpoon, and makes ready to fasten to the whale whenever the order is given by the mate. The mate, during the chase, steers the boat, but after the whale is struck or harpooned, he takes the bow and the boatsteerer the steering oar.

Four of our boats were now down, skimming sweep of her flukes, darted away, while the fool-ish calf, which was quite young, mistaking the first mate's boat for its mother, rolled itself, alongside, emitting a faint little spout, as it rooted its nose against the side of the boat.

"Shall I fasten to this little fellow?" asked the boatsteerer, as he stood hesitating, with harpoon raised.

"Give it to him, George; secure the calf and the cow will not leave," replied the mate.

It seemed cruel to torture this unsuspecting and unsophisticated little creature, as he writhed in anguish, with a harpoon three feet in length driven into his body. Not being able to discriminate between friends and enemies, it lay beating the water with its flukes, without offering to fight or run, after the fashion of old whales.

Knowing that the cow would return to her calf, the mate payed out line and steered off at a suitable distance, while the other boats were endeavoring to harpoon her. Lashing the water with flukes and fins, making it white with foam, and spouting furiously—loud enough to be heard several miles—she started off on a circular course towards her progeny, alternately diving under water and swimming on the surface, till within a few yards of it, when she went down, and immediately came up directly under the calf, landing it on her back. She now struck away from the boats with incredible speed, imagining, perhaps, that her escape with her young was certain; but she was made aware of her mistake when she had run the full length of the slack-rope that he had been payed out of the mate's boat, for the precious burthen was pulled from her

It seemed now as if her anger knew no bounds; with the suppleness of an eel, and the rapidity of thought, she swept her flukes from eye to eye; then raising them over her back, so as to nearly touch the top of her head, threw them back upon the water with astonishing force, in the meanwhile spouting most furiously. It was truly frightful to witness those ferocious and threatening attitudes, which seemed to evince so much wrath, disappointment and chagrin. A mingled feeling of awe, fear and insignificance came over me, as I beheld this mighty monster make its mad gestures. How easy it would have been for her, while in her dreadful anger, to have consigned us all to a watery grave! Fortunate, indeed, for man their mortal enemy, that they know not their power!

indeed, for man their mortal enemy, that they know not their power!

Again she made another circuit, and as she came alongside of the calf, threw her fin over it, and hugging it to her side, sped away the second time to make good her escape; but the distance of a few yards straightened the rope. However, nothing daunted, she kept on, taking the boat after her, the line having been made fast to the loggerhead of the boat. Seeing at length that she gained nothing in distance from her enemy, she relinquished her hold and with an ominous sweep with her flukes, went down.

The boats now formed nearly a circle, and each one prepared to give her a harpoon when she came up, if there was an opportunity. As we were waiting I chanced to look down into the water by the side of the boat, and could just discern some object deep down. It rapidly grew more distinct, and was apparently rising to the surface, but ere the word of warning could be given, she had risen under us, striking the bottom of our frail boat a little forward of midships with her head, knocking a hole through the thin bottom boards, and throwing the bow oarsman some six or seven feet into the air. Fortunately, he came down into the stern sheets of the boat, where we were all most unceremoniously piled by the unusual motion of our shattered craft. The whale now settled a little, and the boat rested fairly the water, but commenced filling rapidly, and ere we could thrust a coat or some loose garment into the breach, she had shot ahead about her length and thrown a corner of her flukes up into the bow, and elevating that portion of the boat to an angle of about thirty degrees, started off with us at railroad speed.

We were promiseuously thrown into the stern end of the boat, and the water rushed over us through the breach while a cloud of vapor and through the breach while a cloud of vapor and foaming spray covered the boat. I must confess that among us by this time there were some pale lips and livid visages, or my visual organs deceived me; although there was one among our number who, I am inclined to believe, had no kind of appreciation of danger and that solicitude for his personal safety was something which he knew nothing of. Even now, he was not lacking in point of good humor and recklessness, for as we swept by one of the boats, the crew of which were struck with fear and astonishment at our singular and dangerous situation, he swung his hat and shouted at the top of his voice. "Here we go boys, homeward bound, free passage—jump aboard?"—This sally had the effect of breaking the spell somewhat, although we could not bring ourselves to the belief that it was all a joke. A distance of a quarter of a mile or so, and our journey was accomplished.

journey was accomplished.

On letting us down, a sweep to the right and left with her flukes, gave us nothing but the fragments of a wreck to buoy us up from the depths of the sea. Fortunately, she left us then, for had she given one more with that powerful weapon, some if not all of us, would then and there have ended our career. She now turned to her calf, which was dying from the effects of its to haul the main yard aback and lower away.

The crew step nimbly about, all bustle and confusion; the ropes rattle on the deck; yards and blocks squeak as they turn on their bolts, and now the sails press back upon the mast.

"Belay all, and man the boats," shouted the acter, imperfections of nature, that call for the pitying sympathy, the tender compassion that makes each the comforter, the monitor of the other. Forbearance helps each to attain command over them wes. Few are the creaturessoutterly evil as to abuse a generous confidence; a calm forbearance. The uniperior to the obstacles in your path. The universal testimony of men whose experience exactly coincides with yours, furnishes the consoling reflection that difficulties must be ended by opposition. There is no blessing equal to the possession of a stout heart. The magnitude of the danger requires nothing more than a greater effort than ever at your hands. If you prove recreant in the hour of trial, you are the worst of recreants, and deserve no compassion. Be not dismayed or unmanned when you should be bold and daring, unflinching and resolute. The cloud whose threat-Four of our boats were now down, skimming over the waves, and gradually diverging from each other as we left the ship. Having arrived in the vicinity of where we saw them go down last, we peaked our oars, and waited impatiently for the whales to come up. All eyes were intently watching any unusual ripple in the water, not knowing precisely where they would rise; besides, there was a great rivalry existing between the boats' crews to see which would fasten to the most whales, as each crew received credit upon the ship's books for every whale they secured, the ship's books for every whale they secured, and these books were examined by the owners after the return home of the ship; hence the eagerness to be the first to discover the whale as she broke water, in order to gain the advantage. Our suspense was not long.

She broke water within fifty yards of the first mate's boat. Every man sprang to his oar, dipping it lightly, and exerting every muscle; the boat shot noiselessly and swiftly forward; but before either could reach a fastening distance, she discovered us, and with a loud spout and a vicious sweep of her flukes, darted away, while the fool-
